I have come to realize this is an essential lesson: In order to survive, you must learn to live without everything. Optimism dies first, then love, and finally hope. But still you must continue. If you were to ask me why, I would say that even without those fundamental things, the great things, the hot-blood-in-the-veins things, there is still enough in a day, in a life, to be precious, important, sometimes even fulfilling. How do I live without you? I put you in the museum of my heart where I often go, absorbing as much as I can bear before closing time.

Life has many museums and many secret corners in the hearts of people. I realize how important it is to feel through every moment, every unheard word or unfamiliar emotion.

Have you noticed once you come back from a trip, everything except you is unchanged. Entropy. You cant put the toothpaste back into the tube once it's out. You cant ever come back the same as when you left home. Its magic!

Sometimes I wake up in the early dawn from the morning prayer sounds. And I cant fall asleep again because the peace is expanding in the room. It is dropping, drop by drop from the curtains and filling up the empty cups, those corners of the heart and my eyes. Then I realize that it's not the cities that are full of people, streets, lost kittens, trains, broken cups, lost coins, buildings and restaurants. It's the people who are full of cities, maps and repeating prayers. And one can only dream that one will be so happy to meet someone who will know how to read one's maps and live in those cities.

And just recently I also realized – all my cities have bridges. Bridges connect some things that otherwise would never meet. As if they were hands reaching out for silence, morning prayers and cups yet to be filled with peace.

Traveler

Your first time out of the country of your own skin, I didn't bring a map.

You always hated that I'd been lucky enough to pick my way through streets

I couldn't pronounce to find cathedrals, graveyards. If you were a city, you said,

I'd only like to know your suburbs. If you were a city, I said, I'd like to know your poor neighborhoods, your inner parts.

Read your graffiti. Drink your tap water.

Feel your smog and dirt stick to my sweat.

Hear your orchestra of sirens and gunshots.

I'd know which of your streets to walk.

If you were a city, I'd expect to be robbed.
